In genetics, a chromosome translocation is a chromosome abnormality caused by rearrangement of parts between nonhomologous chromosomes. A gene fusion may be created when the translocation joins two otherwise-separated genes. It is detected on cytogenetics or a karyotype of affected cells. Translocations can be balanced (in an even exchange of material with no genetic information extra or missing ...

Basic methods Metaphase slide preparation. The DNA on the slide is a reference sample, and is thus obtained from a karyotypically normal man or woman, though it is preferential to use female DNA as they possess two X chromosomes which contain far more genetic information than the male Y chromosome.

Genotoxicity testing includes the measurement of DNA primary damage that can be repaired and is therefore reversible, as well as the detection of stable and irreversible damage (i.e. gene mutations and chromosome aberrations) that is transmissible to the next generation when it occurs in germ cells, and the perturbation in mechanisms involved in the preservation of the integrity of the genome.
